

About the holy crown of St. Istvan:

After reading several thousands of words written by the supposed experts, I found that all participants basically conclude and agree upon that they don't know why the cross on top of the Hungarian crown is tilted. Given the state of the art I too would like to add my theory to the fray: The cross is seated on the top of the crown by design (which appears to be verified by various scientific examinations). I therefore submit that the notion of putting the cross at an angle harkens back to an eastern European and Mideastern concept, where the display of perfection is read as blasphemous and therefore a deliberate flaw must be inserted to display humble deference to a higher authority for whom perfection is reserved. The wearer of the crown with the tilted cross humbly defers perfection to a yet higher authority namely by god.
